By Chris Moore TV control and TV 3 Picture of Chrisharyvey from Fotolia.com Free-a-air TV refers to television stations that are transmitted worldwide without encryption to block the reception. They are different from local air stations as they transmit worldwide rather than locally. Anyone can receive these TV stations without paying for the service, provided they have the equipment to do so. Free-aircraft stations use satellites to transmit signals, very much like most cable and satellite stations. This is the point in which they differ from most free transmission stations that transmit only through antennas. There are some localized TV stations that transmit satellites to make free-aer stations free stations. Free-to-air stations do not encrypt their signals when they transmit them, as opposed to most cable / satellite stations. This is why anyone can receive stations without subscribing a supplier who deceits the signal and / or provides the customer to do so. To receive Free-to-Air TV, people still need special equipment, which are similar to the equipment used for satellite TV packages. A satellite dish is required, along with a FTA receiver that can receive MPEG-2 videos; These are one-off expenses as opposed to the monthly subscription that requires a cable / satellite package. A number of retailers sells these receivers and equipment and often provide lists of available FTA channels. Several countries around the world have multiple free-to-air TV stations available for reception. The number and type of stations available in a country depend on the types of dishes sold in that country and the frequencies they can receive. Europe is a leader in this area, with countries like Germany that receives more than 100 stations. The territorial stations of Europe, irony of fate, are encrypted for copyright purposes, but most dishes sold in those countries include the necessary decryption technology. Because free-to-air stations do not get money from subscription fees, they must generate revenue elsewhere. This usually comes from corporate advertising, tax dollars and / or public donations, very similar trade or public transmission stations receive money.
